For my cyberlore collection I focused on the self-representation of the individual through social media. As I have found that these are better treated as one individual piece with many fragments, I decided to use the two accounts as two cohesive folklore pieces rather than taking individual posts (e.g. screenshots of jokes) out of their original context. Instead, the intent is to have each screenshot be viewed as parts of a whole rather than their own individual, separate items of folklore. An online identity can be anything. Social media allows for one to present themselves as smarter, funnier, or even more attractive than you might actually be, and is a tool used by many for self-promotion. But in this rush for appearances, celebrities without the time or energy to maintain their own accounts sometimes turn things over to others that can better formulate and maintain the online continuation of their public personas for them. There’s a certain level of creativity at play that’s really rather impressive in most instances, because it’s often impossible for the layperson to tell the difference in who is writing those posts. Furthermore, there are numerous false celebrity twitter accounts that post very closely to what the real celebrity account posts and adds an additional level of identity confusion for anyone else (although twitter DOES authenticate their real celebrity accounts). But these public personas play a very large roll in spreading folkloric subject matter in the form of jokes or memes, and are followed by potentially millions. If one image gets posted, it’s there forever, and sometimes creates massive, memorable cultural waves.

Item No.1

Contributor: Mackenzie Keller
Item Title: Tweets from Jaden Smith
Item Category: performance, poetry

POI/Additional Information:

Jaden Smith, son of actor/comedian Will Smith and actress Jada Pinkett Smith, and his sister Willow are increasingly well known for their strange and cryptic tweets. Jaden’s tweets seem to combine self-promotion and artistic/philosophical statements that follow formatting conventions that he has created. No one really completely understands what Jaden’s meaning behind most of his posts are, but it’s obvious he’s trying to convey some message, or at least assert his position as a celebrity or musical genius.

George Takei’s Facebook page is a great example of an individual’s facebook page that is created by a team. While George Takei does have executive power over what jokes and political statements get posted here, it’s primarily run by his husband and some interns. The interesting thing about this is that many people have no idea that this particular celebrity Facebook is not run by said celebrity because of the more personal, joking nature of each post. The comments are also often worth taking note of on this page, because many people respond to these visual jokes and lists with memes and other witticisms building upon the original posts.
Or killed. Huh.
They call this a venting machine.

I saw this posted on the Tylenol vending machine at work...
