Are all intimate relationships inextricably constituted through power, as (among others) Foucault has argued? What other understanding of justice could there be that might think otherwise? This paper looks again at what Foucault did, and Heidegger did not, say from the perspective of the loves of the Greeks.

It suggests that concerning sex we may, so far, have missed the point.