

Hilary E. Kahn, Associate Director for the Center for the Study of Global Change, has been teaching within the Indiana University system since 1997 and has been involved in the internationalization of higher education since 2004. As Associate Director, she oversees and initiates programs and projects involved in the deeper internationalization of Indiana University and assists in the overall administration of the Center. She is the former Director of International Curriculum and Communications at IUPUI and currently an adjunct professor of anthropology at IUB and IUPUI. As a cultural anthropologist, she has taught numerous courses on topics such as anthropological theory, ethnographic methods, visual anthropology, intercultural communication, the anthropology of religion, and indigenous cultures of Central America and Mexico. By using videoconferencing technology to link with classrooms overseas, she has taught students in Macedonia, Indonesia, and Russia. She currently directs an international service learning program in Bluefields, Jamaica. Her topical and regional areas of interest and expertise include international education, intercultural teaching and learning, visual anthropology, indigenous image-making, identity formation, intimate spaces of globalization, and Latin America and the Caribbean. She has presented at national and international conferences, published numerous peer review articles and book and film reviews, and recently published her first book "Seeing and Being Seen: The Q'eqchi' Maya of Guatemala and Beyond" (University of Texas Press, 2006).
