China’s ethnic politics have become increasingly salient during the past few years, with unrest especially noticeable in Xinjiang and Tibet. The state’s public policy towards ethnic minorities is one of the principal means to resolve or at least ease conflicts. However, what are the origins of China’s existing ethnic policies? What is the logic as well as the practical outcomes of those policies? In which direction might ethnic policy evolve in the future?

Dr. Guan Kai is a Fulbright Visiting Scholar at Harvard University’s Fairbanks Center for Chinese Studies and a Professor at Minzu University of China.