This course will trace the development of the rhetorical presidency from Theodore Roosevelt to Obama as it was reflected in and influenced by cultural, political, and technological changes. We will study how political arguments interact with cultural and political norms and practices, political ideologies, practical exigencies, the media through which they are communicated, and the personal predilections and preferences of leaders.