This course exposes students to the concepts central to the field of cognitive psychology such as attention, emotion, attitude, and memory. It does so, however, through critical readings of published research in the areas of both cognitive psychology and media processes & effects. Students will also be exposed to research methods employed in cognitive psychology such as secondary task reaction time, continuous response measurement and psychophysiological measures such as heart rate, skin conductance, and facial electromyography.