Criminalization is today one of the primary governmental responses to the crisis of surplus labor. Beginning by examining the governmental logics that underpin the related phenomena of immigrant detention and deportation, the criminalization of non-citizen behavior, and mass incarceration in the U.S. during recent decades, this presentation follows by proposing a theoretical framework through which to think the political capacity of such figures as the (Undocumented) Immigrant and Criminal.