Charles Beeker is Professor of Kinesiology and Director of the Office of Underwater Science in the IU Bloomington School of Public Health. He is one of the nation’s leading figures in underwater archaeology. In addition to working on the archaeology of shipwrecks from the Caribbean to the coast of Northern California, from the explorations of Christopher Columbus to the exploits of Captain Kidd, he serves on the Federal Advisory Committee for Marine Protected Areas.

Most recently he has been in the national press for the discovery of the ballast from Columbus’s “Santa Maria.” At this luncheon he will speak on Caribbean underwater archaeology starting with the “Indians” encountered by Columbus down to the time of yo-ho-hoing over bottles of rum.

Bring your goggles!
