Is “Beauty is in the eye of the beholder?” Philosophers claim beauty is self-evident, “as obvious as the color blue.” What happens when we examine beauty and its others: goodness, grace, and the grotesque? What sorts of desires and fears does beauty inspire? Is beauty always synonymous with goodness? Does beauty distract from holiness as much as it can bring us closer to it?

Sonia Velázquez, Assistant Professor of Religious Studies and Comparative Literature, has a PhD from Princeton University where she specialized in medieval and Renaissance Spanish literature. She has published articles on theatre and secularization, on medieval storytelling, the speech of barbarians in Renaissance literature, and medieval “ways of seeing,” and the poetry of endings. At IU she enjoys teaching courses in topics ranging from “Nuns and Guns” and “Beauty and Its Others” to “The Human Condition” and “What Was Theatre?” In the fall, together with Ellen MacKay, she organized a funeral banquet with academic, musical and theatrical performances to celebrate the 400th anniversary of the deaths of Shakespeare and Cervantes at IUs Presidents Hall.
